Almost all welding technology depends upon the use of concentrated energy sources to fuse or soften the material locally at the joint, before such energy can be diffused or dispersed elsewhere.

Three heat input combinations which designated as low heat (0.99 kJ/mm), medium heat (1.22 kJ/mm) and high heat (2.25 kJ/mm) have been used to the weld specimen by using flux cored arc welding (FCAW) process.

PDF | Aluminium alloys are sensitive to hot cracking during the welding operation both liquidation cracking in the heat affected zone (HAZ) and solidification cracking in the weld can occur.

Almost all welding technology depends upon the use of concentrated energy sources to fuse or soften the material locally at the joint, before such energy can be diffused or dispersed elsewhere. Although comprehensive treatments of transient heat flow as a controlling influence have been developed

Metallurgical Effects of the Weld Thermal Cycle

Results show that welding heat input has obvious effect on the hardness of the SZ. Under the high welding heat input condition, the hardness of the SZ is lower than that of the base metal (BM).
