Normal baryonic matter, the stuff most physicists study, makes up about 5% of the Universe. If these results are correct, an unknown 75% of the Universe has been identified.

(PDF) What is the Universe made of? How old is it?

Grappling with this new understanding of the cosmos, scientists face one overriding question: What is the universe made of? This question arises from years of progressively stranger observations. In the 1960s, astronomers discovered that galaxies spun around too fast for the collective pull of the stars' gravity to keep them from flying apart.
